England.

Invention by a Frenchman Tried in

Black and White, with the aid of illustrations, gives the following account of an invention of great double utility:

M. Fountain de Livet deserves the thanks of every corporation in England for his new and ingenious adaptation of fire grates and flues. He has, after much experiment, constructed a boiler and furnace in which the refuse of towns is employed for the generation of steam. Thus two birds are killed with one stone as the adage has it. Complete combustion is obtained, unpleasant substances are reduced to scentless ashes, and the steam generated is sufficient to produce an electric light of 25,000 candle power. It must be remembered that nothing but burning refuse produces this remarkable result. No coal or other regular fuel is employed. The peculiarity of the system is in the form of the flues, which are so arranged that the gases produced during combustion part with all their heat before escaping. At the same time very rapid combustion with intense heat is se-

Halifax was the scene of the recent experiments and the general impression of a large number of experts who were present to witness the system in active operation appeared to be entirely in favor of the Livet generator. Indeed, combining, as it does, such invaluable qualities, there seems no reason for doubting its complete success and speedy installation on an extensive scale. The inventor claims that by this system we can secure our electric light for nothing, at the same time we solve a problem of ridding the town of its refuse.

Parlor Games.

Games are popular with young people for many reasons; they set the players at ease with each other, though they may never have met before, quicken the mental faculties, and create no end of amusement. It is necessary, however, to restrain too much vivacity or freedom while engaged in even this harmless'sport. We ought not to endeavor to be noticed for our too great vivacity or freedom. We should be satisfied at showing our talent at playing in our turn, and taking part in the common gaiety without pretension or too great zeal. A young man ought never to seize a lady by the arm, catch hold of ribbon or bouquet, nor pay exclusive attention to the same person. He should be agreeable and pleasant towards all. The selection of games belongs to the ladies. The person who receives the company should be careful to vary them; and With cave Honolulu every Tuesday at 5 r. z., touching at Kabin II, Hielo, Hana, Hamos and Krysham. when she perceives that any game loses its interest, she should propose another.
